Visualized Music Is the Newest Idea of Motion Picture Educators

Visualized music-or materialized musical emotions, whichever way one cares to call it-is the brandnew idea that is to be exploited in motion pictures.

In New York today or tomorrow there will be a private exhibition of the films that have been made of Cyril Maude in . "Peer Gynt," with which will also be "shown" or exploited, the first motion pieture musical theme. The idea has been developed by the Paramount Corporation, and if the "Peer Gynt" experiment is a success every picture that is released by this concern will have its musical theme as well as its picture story—the pictures exploiting both simultaneously and aking, therefore, the first attempt that has been made to combine music and literature outside of the operatic

The visualized music idea is a rather big order for any concern dealing in products that are to be made to fill popular wants, but musicians who have heard the scheme outlined are wildly enthusiastic about it, as they foresee an aid to musical education that will be of greater value than anything heretofore attempted value than anything heretofore attempted.

The scheme for the musical pictures or the pictured music is extremely simple, though it will require the services of most skillful composers to work out the plan to success. It involves the setting of the pictures to an exact musical idea or combination of ideas, which may be original with the one production or may be well known phrases or themes from popular compositons.

or combination of ideas, which may be original with the one production or may be well known phrases or themes from popular compositions. Music, contends the author of the scheme, is a form of expression that is complete as literature. It is, however, different from literature, in that it deals in what might be called tone thoughts, while literature deals in thoughts that are expressed in words.

To the man who is soaked in music, if one might use the expression, each musical composition is a poem or a story. The primitive mind, the mind of the savage, say musicians, understands music better than the average civilized person. The processes of civilization have in a sense made useless this ability to completely understand music.

It is in the chance the pictures give to restore this ability that musicians see the great good that will come of musicalized motion pictures. While the picture is showing a certain action or emotion the musician will express that action or emotion and he so thoroughly identified with it that the average spectator cannot mistake the meaning. In this way a general idea of musically expressed emotion will be given which can be used as the basis for popular musical education.

While the explanation of all this might seem very complicated and "highbrow," the practical demonstration is not that at all. For instance, in the "Peer Gynt" pictures the composer has utilized the well-known themes of the Edvard Grieg suite. Each character in the play has its musical representation which remains the same in spirit throughout the play. Whenever he partici-

remains the same in spirit through-out the play. Whenever he particiin any of the action of the play, his particular theme or varia-tions of it will accompany this ac-tion. In some cases as many as three of these themes are being used at the same time in "Peer Gynt," as three people are involve in a

It has been necessary, of course, to fit the music perfectly to the pictures. That will be necessary in all cases, and in some instances it will be also necessary to invent new themes—in other words, make entirely original compositions to fit the plays. This can be done only by skilled musicans, of course, as the music must fit minutely into every moment of the picture, and requires as careful rehearsal and rearrange-ment as the action of the play itself.

In order to make this practicable for all classes of picture theaters, it has been determined to arrange the music in a number of ways. There music in a number of ways. There will be scores prepared for full orchestras, such as are to be found at theaters like the Strand, in New York; the Studebaker, in Chicago, and other large cities. There will also be scores prepared for smaller orchestras and for the plano or organ alone.

gan alone.
It is the purpose to make all of these as simple as possible so that they may be easily played and quite as easily understood. The idea seems as easily understood. The idea seems to be very well planned. It only remains to see how it will work out. If the people behind it carry out their plans as they have them at present outlined, it would appear that real music will get a brand new lease on life and that a popular understanding of themes that are now held to be very complex and designed only for the most intellectual, will be the result.

Bee Upsets Pulpit.

BELLEFONTAINE, Ohio, Aug. 30 .-The sting of a bee caused the abandonment of two church services. The Rev. C. E. Hamilton, of West Liberty, went to the relief of his horse, which was at-tacked by hees. One of them stung the preacher on the eyelid, causing the eye to swell shut and become so painful that he had to cancel two preaching engagements. The horse was not injured.

Collapse of Defense Opposition Reported

NEW YORK, Aug. 30.-Bringing reports of a decided swing in sentiment throughout the Middle West and South toward a stronger national defense, the board of directors of the Navy League will meet today in the Waldorf-Astoria outline a campaign of education to conducted before Congress meets in Every section of the United States will be represented at today's gathering.

Field representatives of the league are expected to tell of a surprising collapse of the opposition to adequate army and navy appropriations.

It is said that in many localities in which the Congressional delegations formerly stood solidly against naval expenditures it now is hard to find a single member of Congress who will oppose legislation calling for the construction of adequate national defenses in the coming Congress coming Congress.
